
Subject: Re: question to christians about jesus
Posted by Starbuzz on Thu, 31 Jan 2008 23:35:54 GMT
View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

NuneGa wrote on Thu, 31 January 2008 15:46Rocko wrote on Sun, 27 January 2008 21:37I've always wondered how can so many christians place so much faith in a mystical man that lived 2000 years ago? What if jesus was just the greatest magician ever? I wouldn't think it to be too hard to trick and confuse people back then. People mistaked ordinary things for godly occurences all the time.

simply they believe it due to faith...

Personally I wish my mind wasn't so science driven so I could believe in the after life and all that. You may criticise their beliefs but it helps them live their lives...

I could not agree more with you on that, my friend.

I feel the same exact way. I wish many times that I had not read that many books and I sometimes wish I could be a religious person.

Religion creates a supernatural entity that we as humans can put our trust in so we can go on in our life while being one step-ahead of the uncertainties we may face.

I can relate to this and give literally hundreds of examples. When I was a Christian and I got on an airplane, a small prayer to my (former) Savior Jesus Christ would alleviate any fears. It took the weight off my chest and gave me strength. I could actually relax! I am sure most religious people say a prayer when getting on an airplane.

But the same experience as an Atheist was not so pleasant. When I got on an airplane in 2005, I felt...there is no words to really describe what or how I felt.

I felt empty, on-my-own, and was not so confident. I just thought maybe we got a good pilot and the mechanics took care of the airplane. See what I mean? The difference? The incident does not prove "God" exists or not in anyway but it does highlight the weakness of the human mind and the necessity of religion as a means of survival.

Eitherway, since my head is so full of Science, there is pretty much no chance of me going back to religion since it is physically/emotionally impossible due to too much knowledge. It feels weird now when I try to say a prayer.
