High definition support only means that it would output video to HDTV resolution. The graphical power required would likely enable better graphics for developers to create, but knowing Nintendo you'd get HDTV support with NES era graphics.

The major reason I want HDTV resolutions is the time required for a HDTV to upscale 480i/p graphics results in noticeable lag on a game, especially like if you were to play Super Smash Bros. Melee on my set. There's a quarter of a second delay in the gameplay versus how you're making input with the controller, which isn't really all that fun.
