Small businesses that get bought out by larger companies often do better. The new company has:

- a larger base of capital
- established suppliers
- larger R&D programs
- name recognition

...and that's just to name a few. Do you people think companies like Linksys would be able to compete better on a global scale, and deliver cost-effective products if they were not acquired by a large company.

Same goes for a gaming company. A small developer that gets acquired by a large one will be able to expand their product line-up: either by being able create sequels and spin-off's, or by expanding over different platforms like the Playstation, and Xbox.
