You're right; I won't ever know real honor like a soldier does unless I enlist and go through the same things they do. I'm just saying he did not treat the situation like a good leader would have. Merit to be an ass? Maybe to another soldier, but not to a cadet I wouldn't think. Cadets are taught, and as far as I know soldiers too, to handle situations in a respectable and civilized manner. Cadets simply are not exposed to what a soldier is, so of course we will not know what a soldier knows, or feel what a soldier feels. A soldier I would think, would take this into consideration when dealing with any situation. However, I do also know that the Marines are much different than the other branches in regards to honor, discipline, etc, but even then, he's the very first Marine I've met that has treated a situation like this the way he did.
