I remember years ago when I was in 'little league' , parents expressed concern about aluminum bats, and how they'd make the ball go a bit faster. I also remember something about 'capped bats' or something of that nature that caused concern.

Metal bats last a long time, saving cash-strapped leagues money, and actually give kids a chance to swing the damn thing; seeing eight year-old's swing around a maple bat is painful to watch. I remember using a bat similar to the TPX before I went into Bantam, and that thing was surprisingly light: you could hit one out of the park with one hand if you wanted.

It's a real shame about the kid, but suing the manufacturer is just dumb. Still, you can't exactly blame them either... the amount required to rehabilitate the kid, and keep him functioning is astronomical, and that's a bill Mom and Dad won't be able to pay.
