If the parents feel like blaming someone, they will have to look at the batter kid who hit the ball and/or the Little League Baseball people who made the decision to use the metal bats. Then again the hypocrisy of it all is that, according to the article, there is no proof wooden bats would have made the difference.

A ball hit the boy with force. That is the cause of the accident. And when this happens in a sport that has a history of such incidents, then nobody is responsible.

The lawsuit will fail. What pisses me off is how the marketing strategies of the bat manufactures are brought into this natural tragedy.
