(I disagree... half-life is not such a bad way to live... assuming you are a Free-man.)

Heh, while it may not be a life you see for yourself now, things may change before then, or even after the incident.

Part of my bioethics course was on the justification of Personal Directives (living wills)... and its surprising how tough it can get to make the right choice when someone's life is in your hands and what their wishes may be at the time their life is threatened and what their life would be like after.

Anyway, off topic, I know... just an amusing one since the idea of living wills was brought up - at least indirectly.
