Are comments like this really necessary? I mean you try to make an intelligent point but bringing personal quips such as this to the argument only serve to prove your asininity in debate. Why I went to the doctor has no bearing on the argument so it is not a topic of the debate, for all intents and purposes it is hypothetical.

I just gave you a hint, a back problem is probably the most simplest pain to cure.

why? because your body is equipped to heal it, pain killers and rest, with a little exercise can heal it in one week.

I really don't care how my argument looks, even if i add shit like that, big fucking woop! There are other things in life to worry about other than MY intelligence and how an argument looks on the Internet, besides, I couldn't give two fucks what people think of me.

oh, it has no bearing in the argument yet you use it to try and prove a point.. I'm tempted to call you an oxymoron here but I just don't think that word justifies this situation.

If you're good going to a doctor that spends the minimal amount of time looking at your problem because he has 20 other patients to look at then go for it but I will go to the doctor who will spend more time on my problem and treatment. If he is good at his work he will be rewarded with more business from other customers.

Competition? From what? Is this the quality vs. quantity debate again? It better not be since you don't think there is such a thing as "quality" in health care.

first of all, a doctor can be appointed to people with a common cold to a possible patient with MS (Multiple Sclerosis), The doctor will say to the patient with a common cold, wait three fucking days, it will go away, and then go to the patient with Multiple Sclerosis and tell him what's going to happen, give his sympathy and prescribe painkillers to stop the pain you're going to get with that illness.

Just because a doctor doesn't want to waste 30 minutes with you because you have the flu or a pain in your leg doesn't mean he might not give a fuck for you, but that the other people he has to treat might need more attention because it's more serious.

as for qualiteh, there's standards, I mean this is American we're talking about, so things might be different, Public hospitals might be dirty places infested with all sorts of diseases opposed to private hospitals that are completely clean but hey, that's me generalizing America as stupid unfair fucks like the rest of the world is doing.

protip: dignifying the last paragraph with a reply would make you look like an idiot.

P.S: Just because a doctor doesn't want to waste time on you because you have a common cold and if I assume correctly you'll pull the "that's not quality" retort, I'll agree it's not quality, it's common sense.
