It 'could' be used as a strategy, but it barely does anything to place nukes in your own base.

I think it actually does a lot from my own view. I know that whenever I hear a nuke/ion has been placed I get all tight, leave the spot I was at(I'm usually a hottie playing defense/base support so I know it's my role to protect/defend the base) and start to run around the base looking for it. If I hear another beacon placed, it means that the places I have checked before and regarded as safe, are no longer and I need to recheck, thus wasting valuable time(mainly having to go check barr/hon again as a must). I guess playing most of my time as a defender has taught me to respect and fear beacons. That is why I go to place/distract them sometimes from my own base, it actually works sometimes and that's all that counts.
