If you know who this person is, report them to the police. If you don't, then now would be an excellent time to upgrade your security, especially in the firewall department. Most "hackers" aren't really all that good at what they do, and unless this guy's somewhat decent and has a real case of the ass for you, a good firewall should be all you really need. ZoneAlarm is a good freeware firewall that you should take a good, close look at.

If you're really worried about this and have no other option, disconnect your computer from the threatened network. Losing internet access for a while is better than having some punk screw with your computer.

If you have important files and need to back them up, please develop some common sense and buy yourself a flash drive. Nothing sucks like losing all of your files, and some pissy little internet greifer is hardly the only way that could happen. You can buy a huge external hard drive these days for less than $100US, and flash drives 1GB and under are generally less than $20. If you can afford a computer, then you can afford to back up your files.
