I don't need to research your "arguments" to know you're a pretentious ass. You don't know much about the situation beyond what you've seen in mass media and I think it's obvious to most people that what you and I read online from CNN, BBC, etc is going to be just a little bit more tailored to our viewpoints than Russian news agencies would report. My real problem with you is that you're not right, not by a long shot. You're sitting at home behind a monitor while Russia is attacking Georgia and you think you know the answers to the conflict and what sparked it. Go ahead and do another point-by-point rebuttal, that I won't read, if you think it makes you look smart. But don't pretend that you're informed on a situation you've never even come close to seeing for yourself. When you admit that you know nothing and endeavor to correct that ignorance, you'll join the rest of us and try to figure out what's going on over there.
