-Tech-PiMuRhoThe only thing that would have encouraged EA to make a sequel is solid sales of the original. No amount of signatures are going to convince them otherwise.

Do you really think that everyone that signed would actually buy a sequel if they made it? I don't.

The man said it. Decisions like that are made based on SALES. No petition, no matter how large, will EVER convince a game company to make a sequel to a game that did not sell enough copies to warrant one.

I am not signing, it is a waste of time.

It will, the idea behind a petition is to convince the company that there are enough people willing to buy this game, thus then they can make a sales based calculation on whether it would be worth making any money or just not being worth the bother.

Thus they are not so stupid to make a choice based on one type of calculation, although you may not think it EA does respect the fans and they know without them their games wouldn't sell at all.

2000 ppl or however many people signed it now will make no difference.

Now 2 Million would probably guarantee the game's release .

So everybody go sign 1000 times....
