Instead of 'protesting' the DRM by illegally downloading the program, maybe just not buy it, OR not download it. When EA realizes lower profits, and lower piracy figures, they will likely feel pressured to drop DRM.

good points but you see most are desperate kids living with mom and dad who give them their lunch money. So they take it upon themselves as having no choice. And then we have the children who have money but don't like to spend. of course, rich kids and then the people who like to have a physical copy of the game in a shiny case/box (me) would buy the game no matter what anti-piracy measures they put on.
