I don't understand the point... 99% of people suck with the mouse on the other hand and even so what good would having two cursors do? Maybe I'm missing something, but who would spend money on this?

That being said, it wouldn't be too difficult to program some sort of app that draws a virtual mouse cursor on the screen and tracks the input of the second mouse. Then you can emulate primary-mouse clicks on the virtual cursor's location when you receive a click event.
