We've had this issue in Germany a while ago.

One of the big ISPs (1&1) began to fire their customers who produced exzessive (I think Torrent) traffic. 1&1 even offered money to them to leave, no matter if the contracts minimum runtime has been accomplished or not.

Some other ISPs followed this example. Others don't but I know some Cable Providers that also throttle bandwidth in the evenings.

So a Flatrate isn't a real Flatrate anymore. The DSL prices are lowered to the ground in this country and that is the problem: They are all miscalculated. They should be lifted up to get real flats back.
