I don't think YOU are doing that, but (seemingly) most people do. However, I still don't think disregarding someone because of their religion affiliation or lack thereof is valid.

I'm not saying there aren't legitimate grievances with religions and the teachings inherent in the religion, BUT just because someone is associated with the religion doesn't mean that they should be grouped in with the rest.

The vast majority of Christians believe that homosexuality is wrong, and they work tirelessly to keep Gay Marriage illegal. That doesn't mean, however, that there are no sane Christians deserving of a vote. Even if Obama is/was a Muslim, if he keeps his faith's teachings from mixing with government, then I don't see the problem.
