

---

Subject: Re: Why did you vote for Obama?

Posted by Jecht on Mon, 08 Dec 2008 15:28:57 GMT

View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

---

I see the logic in oppression, but the insurmountable flaw in politically forced-coercion methods (oppression) is that it directly births revolution. Eventually the masses will no longer tolerate the restrictive regulations of the few elite, and the process will right itself...so to speak.

I'm still against Gay marriage, but not against Gay rights. In my personal opinion (this is why I'm not a politician), I believe marriage stems from religion and is separate. I'll just be content for now to let politicians interpret what they see fit is a right granted by the constitution. I'll let scientists hash out whether it's a choice or biological. I'm in Information Systems, so i'll deal with that field.

Oppressors want ultimate control over many people, and ignorantly they believe dated management styles will hold up, even though they've failed a thousand times over. These reasons are why I like America's Constitution so much. Change occurs slowly, and requires many different people seeing eye to eye. Change can happen, but it must be on the basis of the (representative) majority. Unfortunately, I'm recently seeing a flaw in this system - the political parties. Our current president and our future president-elect has thus far left me...disenfranchised. I didn't like McCain or Palin either. I definitely hope the president-elect will change my mind though. The rebound of the economy is the largest step. If he does a good job turning the country around then he'll have my vote come 2012. If it's excuses much like our current Governor of Michigan, then I'll choose another candidate.

---