I've said it before: Atheism is no more a religion than monotheism or polytheism. It is a term which allows you to categorize a set of beliefs; all it tells you is how many gods a person believes in, and nothing else besides. One could be an atheist and believe in any number of supernatural beings, places, forces, events, whatever- as long as none of them are gods. By the same token, you could be an atheist who abhors science and is a true believer in intelligent design (provided that said design was the doing of an advanced being and not a divine being).

Or are we suddenly to assume that all monotheists follow the same set of beliefs? Which faith gets to carry the banner, hmm?

Generalization breeds ignorance no matter who uses it.
