Wait, so he's supposed to have PROOF that God DOESN'T exist because he says there's no proof that he DOES?

As it stands, whether God does or does not exist is merely speculation on the part of everybody. The only thing you have on your side is a book written by man that knew little to nothing about the actual state of our physical world besides the primitive observations made.

Here's the fun thing about science versus religion. When either side cannot answer a question, they both start to speculate. With science, however, they don't just leave it at speculation. Instead, they start to test their speculation to prove or disprove their speculation (also called a "hypothesis"). With religion, a speculation remains a speculation. They can't prove it or disprove it. It's nothing more than an educated guess, and I would still even debate it being "educated".

Now, that's not to say that religion and science can't cooperate. In fact, a lot of things said in the Bible could very well be true stories, but since they were unexplained or boring (after all, these are STORIES), the authors had to take some creative license. Science/history has been able to verify these stories. Either way, none of this can prove or disprove the existence of a supernatural being, since we can only test the physical world.
