If it provides you with information that someone without the custom HUD wouldn't have at all (mine limit), then it is a cheat. If you can see on your HUD information which another player must bring up a view-obscuring status screen to obtain (building health), then it is a cheat. If you can see through a normally opaque display while another player might have a blind spot because of it, then you are also cheating. You aren't creating the sort of disgusting imbalance that a wallhacker would, but you're still loading yourself with advantages that other players do not have.

We aren't talking about 'lock camera to turret' radio button here; if the change cannot be made from inside the game using the settings menu then it has no place in an online match.

The only exceptions I can see to that are custom crosshairs and color changes.
