I can think of quite a few times when I've told or been told a clan join password (when they actually worked) or a botname password on a renegade PM. It's not credit card details, but it's quite easily abusable. If people have always been under the impression that PMs are indeed private unless one of the two participants decides to show someone a SS of it, then it's probably wrong to change that without informing people.

andr3w's example of "such-and-such really was dumb enough to admit to cheating to me by PM" isn't relevant... he admitted it to you, you were the person he sent the PM to, you were always able to read his admission.
