
Subject: Re: The 800 teapartys today
Posted by Muad Dib15 on Wed, 29 Apr 2009 00:00:09 GMT
View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

cheesesoda wrote on Mon, 20 April 2009 20:00
I'm pro gay-marriage, so I'm thrown in with the liberals.
I'm pro-separation of church and state. Oops, liberal again.
I'm pro-responsible government spending. I'm a conservative, apparently (even though conservatives like to waste money, too).

First yes, last yes, middle, not really. See separation of Church and State is basically not letting any church set rules that govern the state. Separation From church and state would be liberal. Because, then you are taking any christian, judio, hindu, bhuddist, whatever influence out of the picture all together. Then, what morals would we base our country on. You can't base them on anything because every religion teaches morals. Separation of Church and State is as I said before, not allowing any religion to make any rules but still have some influence in the morality of the rules. Separation from Church and State takes all religious influnce, good or bad out all together. I agree that having a church run state is bad for this country because of the way we are, but we shouldn't cut it out all together because some liberal atheists are butthurt about it. It is necessary for the moral fiber of America.
