Well, the metaphor doesn't work.

I only said that "one is in control of their own sins." Not "One is in control of their own sins, like they are with everything else in their life."

In this case, you are obligated to either accept or deny that he died for your sins. If you accept it, then you accept forgiveness and get your sins renewed. If you deny, than you just go on living like you are.

It has nothing to do with anything else.

I mean, if someone said "I have a cold" would you automatically assume they were going to die simply because the fact that there are other diseases out there that are fatal?

I'm not even a Christian, and yet I'm also getting sick of it. People should stop shoving their beliefs down other peoples' throats; that includes Christians, Jews, Atheists, and any other body that would want to do something as silly as that.

Altzan wrote on Tue, 12 May 2009 20:57 While possible, it is very unlikely that someone will be successful in changing someone else's beliefs via a gaming forum where nobody knows who you really are.

Threads like these should probably stop, since nobody has really changed anything except let be known where they stand...

Take note at what I have said in this thread regarding the topic.

Now realize that I, in fact, don't believe in any of the nonsense I've been saying.

Therefore, both your post's accusations of people in this thread are wrong.
