That's entirely false. I had a n00bstories Marathon server on that nickname. A couple NS admins were running it on n00bstories' behalf, so they had access to the username/password that Jelly allowed me to use. When they got mad at me, they renamed the server and made it their own even though n00bstories had been granted permission to use that nickname, not a brand-new community. Jelly had previous rejected requests from more established and long-standing communities such as Black Intel and Black Cell and probably others in favor of n00bstories continuing to use the nickname. However, Jelly has been ignoring my PMs on forums and IRC and won't even give me a simple "yes, I let them use it." So, until I hear that, it's simple for me or anyone using any sort of logic to consider the nickname STOLEN.

It's no different than if I owned a chain of restaurants and opened a new one in a prime downtown location that I negotiated a great lease on with the owner, and I hired some people to run the store and be managers of it, and then they changed the sign on the door and kept all the money for themselves.

In the real world, I would have grounds for legal action and would sic my lawyer on them. In Renegade-land, I have no recourse at all.
