Corvette's are making them a nice tidy profit. Last I checked, the dealer invoice for a base model is about $49,000 (US) and the MSRP for that model is around $53,000 so the dealer stands to gain four grand alone.

The 'C7' Corvette is already in the works, and it may come out a bit smaller, and considerably lighter than the current generation.

We know the Z28 Camaro here won't be a huge moneymaker for GM, but it won't lose them any because the car's already built for it, and the engine is currently used in the Corvette and Cadillac CTS-V. What is newsworthy about this is because people were actually worried that the government would stop GM from making cars like this (aka, cars that people want), and make us drive Tata Nano clones. On the flip side, lots of people (hippie douchebags) wanted GM to do just that because they (hippie douchebags) feel that they know what's best for everyone. This car is the ultimate "fuck you" to them.
