I happen to think that much of the music that Linkin Park makes isn't particularly "emo."

I think a lot of it is reverse psychological. And it's actually very clever if you want to talk revenue.

I remember that a lot of people used to comment on Linkin Park songs (particularly drunk "hipster" females) saying that their songs reflected their own life.

I don't think that the music that Linkin Park makes is directly reflective of any of the members of the band, to a degree, but rather they are trying to connect to the audience saying "you're problems are real, so you aren't alone."

I see their music as very motivational in a psychological sort of way.
