What do you eat up there in Canadia? Snow and whale blubber?!

This is usually a bad idea. When you first start playing a game and have no idea what to do and what to expect, everything seems terrible. I remember my first XCCOM: UFO Defense experience, and that game seemed nigh-impossible. I wrote it off as a bad game, when I simply hadn't grown accustomed to it.

Needless to say they do, and for long periods of time at once. Maybe the problem lies with you?

Derp.

That would make sense, since MMOs generally have lower graphical requirements due to how fucking huge everything is, and since WoW was released at around the same time WarCraft 3: The Frozen Throne was (They were, in fact, being developed concurrently), and the art style would be consistant since the two games are part of the same series being developed by the same developer.

DimitryK wrote on Tue, 01 December 2009 00:35 After 5 minutes of playing I removed the game from my HDD to prevent me from getting a huge trauma. Unfortunately, Blizzard keeps telling the world to try their fed up game at trywarcraft dot com.

I hope Blizzard dies a long and slow death until they are bankrupt. May the financial crisis hit them hard.

I'm sure they'll feel the effects of your curse as soon as they're done rolling around in WoW cash, and they small fortune they're going to earn on StarCraft II once the WoW cash runs out, and the small fortune they're going to earn on Diablo III once the StarCraft II cash runs out.

Mindless? You take that back! >:[

I don't really have a problem admitting I'm a fan of Blizzard games. They make excellent games. Personally, I can't speak for WoW since the subscription costs were kind of a turn-off, but they have enough of a reputation for making quality products for statements like this:

to be exposed for the angry impotent nerdrage that it is.
