Pacific Grove is a pretty okay part of town, but if your dad really did grow up in PG you would know that In-N-Out really is all that, especially when compared to any other chain. He probably has a below-average impression of In-N-Out because the nearest one is in Salinas, and everything sucks in Salinas.

As for In-N-Out's Christy tendencies, it doesn't bother you if you don't look under the cup, and even if you accidentally do, you only have to ponder upon the behavior of their CEOs to be reminded they're no different from any other company (Other than how delicious their shit is!)

in-n-out got these sissy patties, they're nothing else than superior big macs - which is great, don't get me wrong. however, a true burger aficionado mixes it up with thicker, flame grilled traditional burgers, basically superior whoppers. the mountain burger at the hi-lo cafe in weed, california takes the cake in this category, followed by the 6$ burger. optional fancy high brow 3rd burger variety can be found at zuni in san francisco, which is excellent in its own right.
