The thing is though, anime receives this generalization stereotype outside of Japan that it doesn't really deserve.

Anime that is licensed and aired outside of Japan usually fits that stereotype and that's what fuels the rage.

The fact is, unless you just dislike animation entirely or dislike sitting through stories (in which case you would also be the type of person who skips over single player modes in videogames), then there is an anime out there that you will like. If you like to watch TV, then there is an anime that is on the same exact subject of the TV show you like (unless it's like a reality/game/contest show like American Idol or Who Wants to be a Millionaire.)

If you like serious shows, then there are serious anime. If you like science fiction, then there is something for you. Comedies, romances, crime dramas, ect, ect.... there is something that you will like if you just give it a shot.
