

---

Subject: Re: Protest the Pope

Posted by R315r4z0r on Fri, 17 Sep 2010 01:06:04 GMT

View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

---

While people pretend to understand how the word works, the reality is that no one has the slightest clue.

There is absolutely nobody in the world that fully understands any one item; be it a system or a person or whatever. There might people who consider themselves professionals in certain fields, but that by no means means they know all there is to know about their given field.

This, tied in with human's natural yet baseless fear of openly admitting to ignorance, is what allows certain crimes and whatnot to go on.

The average person would rather admit to not knowing something because "they don't care" rather than admit to making a mistake or having the wrong insight.

Bad things like this will happen and continue to happen because few too little people will openly confront their actions by questioning the motives of the people they blindly believe in. Most people will just allow it to continue because they don't care enough to actually delve into things that are actually happening. They trust their good name and can't comprehend them doing something bad. Some will even go as far to outright defend something they don't fully understand.

..In this case, people would defend Christianity and the Pope because he is a Christian... but at the same time be unaware of what he really has done.

---