The way I see it, if they are running 2000, they probably have their reasons. However, they most likely aren't focused on playing games.

If it requires a lot of effort and/or it will drain the overall experience of the people who don't use 2000, then I suggest omitting it from the supported OSs.

If it's of no real consequence, then I really don't see the harm in including it.

Or, if what you're doing with this information is patchable, you could always just omit Windows 2000 support and just have people who use that OS have to download a patch.
