see, it still had hope

yes, despite the "majority".

Quote:Quote:yes, that is the most important part of the equation... by far.

i suppose, since all else is reduced to speculation except in the quite large number of cases where we know why people won't host a clan league.

you'd be surprised how much contempt most clanwars players have for anyone willing to put any time or money into hosting a server or whatever.

and yet even if everyone had perfectly noble reasons for not hosting a clan ladder, the fact that they weren't hosting them would still be the important part of the equation instead of the why of it.

Quote:Quote:i assume you mean what if the clean track record players wanted the bug and the cheaters wanted the pointsfix?

yah, i got too used to saying one thing what then?

then it's possible that might make me reconsider.

Quote:Quote:well, if they think it's worth their effort, it reinforces my point that one of them ought to have put some in.

how could a regular player put in effort? in what way do you mean, by assuming Whiskey's role as renadmin?

yes, applying for the renadmin job and doing a diligent job of it would certainly be one way of putting effort in. and yet despite how many times i tried recruiting one, not many people applied and even fewer turned out to be any good.

Quote:Quote:i can see you're not going to easily digest the idea that open debate on a particular question is a good thing for its own sake.

i just assume you have some evil intention because you're British and you seem to enjoy debates in general some people have fun in winning things, even if their opponents are terrible are you one of those people?

i do think free, open debate is a good thing. i also like being proven right, though there is value in being proven wrong (cos you come out of it knowing more than you did before). of course, there are a depressing number of people who can't stand being proven wrong (look at hate, he's still angry and it's been some months)
