From my experience, google's algorithm is made to retrieve most sites (bar 100 % image / flash of course). I do some web development myself and i never had a website that wasn't retrieved by google after a few hours / days. Bear in mind that I do place a link on a rather popular site immediately after release, to speed up this process.

The unique content of the website will allow people to retrieve your website easier, simply because there's less other sites that offer the same. Example: I created a site for medical elections, names it `medicalelections.<domain>` and it was almost immediately the 2nd or 3rd in the list on google. However, when I created one for a polyclinic, it was way harder to nail the website down with logical keyword simply because there are 1.000s of polyclinics in Belgium. However, when one went looking for the name of a doctor working in this polyclinic, the site came up first in the results.

SEO might just give you an extra edge in a competitive environment, but I'm with clown on this one.
