Not unless you're the one doing the nut-kicking. :V

But seriously, I get what you're saying. Tic-tac-toe might be a bad example though, but I get what you're saying. It be like comparing a spitting contest to an Olympic game.

However a multiplayer video game being compared to another multiplayer video game does not have that difference between them. They are both games in which multiple people play and compete in to a similar degree. Any FPS with a multiplayer component and a ranking system is on the same playing field regardless of how they play. It isn't like comparing Angry Birds to Unreal Tournament where the level of competitiveness is obviously different.

But I do suppose you could count the player bases for each game to determine how competitive it is. A game that has a longer list of competitors on an active ranking ladder would most likely be considered a more competitive game.
