I don't think I said anything that gave the impression that I was all "pro-science."

I have absolutely no problem with people who are religious. The point I was trying to make was that it's possible for you to become so focused on what you believe to be 100% certain that you lose perspective of whatever else is going on in the world.

I centered the idea of my last post around religion because that's what this thread is about. But I purposely through a non-religious example in there to show that my point applies in many areas outside of religion.

I'm not trying to hate on religion or people that believe in it. Nor am I trying to categorize people who follow religions into a stereotype. I'm merely pointing out that if you tell yourself to start believing something, you eventually will and you will eventually limit yourself in the long run.

If there is some type of person I am against, it's the kind of person who purposely limits their understanding of others because of their own short sighted ambitions.
