
Subject: Re: chinese translation

Posted by EvilWhiteDragon on Wed, 09 May 2012 12:21:48 GMT

View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

FlaminGunz wrote on Wed, 09 May 2012 03:09 that's your opinion of tattoos?...pretty sad, i thought ewd's was bad!

dogs mark their territory to say it's theirs and to discourage others from coming around....like many other animals.

i don't really see how getting a tattoo is anything remotely like that. I certainly don't know anyone that gets a tattoo to overtly tell others that their body is theirs or tell people to fuck off....i guess some gang tattoos might discourage people though and yeah they do tend to have a bad connotation as i said, but i think that's more from older generations that don't understand younger generations. It seems it's much less looked down on with people of my generation, but i guess that differs between countries/geography and what kind of society you brought up in meh, analogy doesn't make that much sense to me, but i guess that's your view.

as i said, mine's also going to be on my ribcage, one of my criteria was to ensure it's always covered in day to day life. It's definitely not just to show people or mean anything like stay away haha!

LOL! I'm not saying tattoos are bad. I'm saying that I think that if you do put on something permanent on your body, you should know for certain what it means. If you cannot read it yourself and it's not a text given to you by some special person, then why put it on your body?

Tattoos with a personal meaning can be extremely beautiful and fitting. Tattoos which incorporate Chinese because of you designing something in Korea does not seem well thought of to me. As Reborn states, why Chinese if your experience is in Korea? And, if you want it in Chinese, you should carefully decide on which Chinese language.

I was trying to encourage you to think this through. From what I've heard it's a rather painful process to have it removed.
