Hmmm, I love shit like this.

They did exist or will exist and if they are there now we will never know.

The only message we could ever get and receive as information will be so old that were ever it came from will have long gone cold. We look threw out telescopes at places that no longer exist as we see them, the light is too old to see anything we could use. Because its all changed, it

Most of the nebula we see at night no longer exist and have since become planets and suns, but we wont see them for millions of years and would never know what happened because by the time that light reaches us, our own sun would have burned cold.

If an alien, you know the sort, green skin, a few too many eyes, looks threw their telescope at us. What they would see right now is a small nebula that will form our sun and one day the earth (in just a few million years). They could not know we are here. And we see the same when we look at them. Funny when you think about it. The whole fucking universe could be teaming with life and no would ever know.

If there was a signal, if by chance we do hear anything other then static, all it would be is TV from another world.

beamed out of Germany, and that broadcast showing those nazi soldiers parading back and forth will one day reach another planet, it will be a long while before our real messages get there, and if they are listening, at all, all they can hope for is to find out what we were like, its unlikely we will be around at that time.

Space travel, possible, but think about it, you can only travel to places you know about, after a few thousand light years your maps are wrong, by the time you get even a short way all your information is out of date and you would end up flying in to something nasty. Even if you could rip
