I've given this a lot of thought. I've come up with what I believe are my final theories for Revolutions. Since the movie opens in 3 days, I felt it would be appropriate to start a new thread.

I believe that Smith is the key. EVERYTHING revolves around Smith. Recall the following quotes:

"Hmmm. Upgrades."

"The problem is choice."

"...felt compelled to disobey."

What's clear to me is that Smith, as an agent, continually received software upgrades to be more human and more able to deal with guerilla humans (Morpheus, Trinity, etc). Being around humans and the need to learn more about them and their behavior has caused the ability to make choices to be programmed into Smith, and after several generations of upgrading, he is now so near human that he represents a threat to "the system itself." He is the "Neo of the machines" so to speak.

This is the link between Neo and Smith. "Some part of you rubbed off onto me..." Smith carries some of Neo's code, and Neo carries some of Smith's code. This connection is what allows Neo to destroy the sentinels in the real world. In a fight between Neo, being human, and Smith being only a simulation of a human, I'm sure Neo will prevail. In fact, I would guess that Neo can copy himself within the matrix the same way Smith can.

What happens to the people within the matrix? Zion? The Oracle? I haven't a clue. Although in the last case I'd guess that the Oracle becomes a Smith. The rest of the details most likely rely on information that we haven't yet been given.

Can't wait 'till Wednesday!
