DBBSo I mean what should I know before I go into it? Ive been training and stuff like working out double time and running around with backpacks full of weights and in heavy clothing(I dont think thats good for you but I guess it would be like running with full gear on!) Well anymore help on the basic training section would be appreciated. And, can you fail it? Or no?[/url]

Have you taken an ASVAB yet? If so, do you know what field you would like to get into? Infantry is good if you're thinking about the military as a career or going into law enforcement after, but if you're looking to do something else with the rest of your life, you should consider a more technical field. Whatever you do, don't go "open contract". Make sure you sign up for something specific and don't be too eager. It's kind of like dealing with a salesperson, try to make them believe they need you as much as you want them. Don't sign anything the first time you talk to them either. Ask questions, get literature, ask more questions, but don't sign. Recruiters are pretty sly, and like salespeople, they might tell you sign now or miss this opportunity. No matter how friendly they might seem, to most of them you're just a number to fill their quota. Anyway, after you do talk to them, let us know what they said and I'm sure if anyone here can help, they will. Good Luck
