InfinintA permanent base on the moon would have its advantages, but not as much as having a permanent base on mars. Mars's atmosphere is very different from our, but if you were to remove all the trees from earth our atmospheres would be almost identical, which means that mars can be transformed into an almost "second earth".....*blah blah blah*

So is that a yes or a no?

InfinintActully, the moon is some times seen is a valuable source of minirals...

It still wouldn't be worth all the money of going there.

I'd say no because thereare way more important things to worry about that probably cost way less money to fix. I don't think we should even be worrying about going to other planets right now. He is, after all, a politician, and probably is just speaking to try to sound good. Don't get me wrong I agree with him on most things. Just consider what it takes to get elected these day. Money is the main thing, used to campaign. Besides money you get elected by sounding good, even if you have absolutely no clue what you're talking about (which is often the case). We could conceivably be fed a bunch of made up garbage.

Imagine how stupid you'd feel if you believed so deeply and having no clue that what you believed in was a bunch of garabage. Now imagine you live in the United States.....
