To save my own time, and without changing any words, I'm just going to cut'n'paste from that paper we did:

Atheism

(Dictionary). Atheism is a philosophy where no God is present, and is therefore reliant on the belief that the universe is dictated solely by logic and the measurement of matter and energy.* The universe however, is obviously too large for any human to measure, and therefore uncertainty takes the place of the unmeasured. The atheist philosophy makes the claim that there is no God, but fails to account for the uncertainty in the universe. For an atheist to say that God cannot exist, without measuring every part of the universe, is premature and illogical. For a philosophy based logic cannot exist, neither can a logical atheist. If there is no such thing as a logical atheist, what base a philosophy on the hypocritical logic atheism does, rather promote logistical debates on the conclude it, as no conclusion can ever be reached. It is therefore impossible for any human being to logically accept the atheist concept of God, whereas agnostic atheism allows logistical debate.

*This line does spark an awful lot of argument. But you must realize, when I say that you disbelieve or deny the existence of God or gods, you must understand that includes supernatural forces that govern us. That includes magic and whatnot. Who/whatever creates them DOES fall into the category of a God or gods because it is a force that humans are superceded by.
