it's not an oil strike...it's a national strike. Everything is on strike...even the unemployed workers union (yes...there is one of those there) actually...alot of the oil companies have gone back in and are working again...although not at an even considerable amount of their original productivity.

My main point is that there is a country that wants our support...needs our support...and we're pretty much just giving them scraps. A small occupational force would end any conflict the Venezuelan army can put up...which they would more than likely back down...thus boosting Americas popularity.
