God has nothing to do with my views on homosexuality, because I am not religious.

I feel that it is a genetic trait designed into species for a reason, just like anything else. I say it is a mistake because in the whole survival of the fittest plan, not reproducing makes you lose. Thus, anyone who is homosexual has 'losing' genes. I can't see any real benefit to the species by having a bunch of the population not reproduce unless there is something wrong with their genes, and I have a feeling that when we understand more about the way the human genome works there will be some evidence of this.

That's about the extent of my interest on the topic, really. I don't care what people do behind closed doors or in the privacy of their own homes, though I do get annoyed by all the people who like to flaunt that they're gay, as if it makes them cooler than everyone else. Then again, I hate any kind of 'minority' people who like to flaunt their differences as being better than everyone else. News flash: you're 99.99999% the same as every other person here. Any difference is perceived in your mind.
