Seems you have similar reading tastes to mine. Another offshoot of the Dune storyline is when Maud'dib loses his eyes, he is able to use his prescient abilities to see a split second into the future/past around him, the time differential is negligible and in effect he sees as normal. In an Asimov story (I can't remember which one) they developed a machine that could see through time. In the end people used this machine to see into a particular area a moment in the future. This meant they were using it for military intelligence, to nosy in on the latest scandal, or merely to see the shower in the house down the street where the woman you are attracted to lives.
