I do wonder why you're called "black hand studios" when you don't have a studio; rather a group of people who (for the most part) know each other from talking on the internet, and most of you probably haven't met in person. Yet in that professionally typed article you're a corporation and trying to pass yourself off as some sort of company. If I organised a group of friends and vowed to support a genre of games with products I wouldn't start calling my group a corporation I'd just say we were a bunch of guys who have a passion for <games> and we want to support them. Having a website is definitely one of the best ideas you can have for web-based support and updates but you don't need to start getting things all professional; there's no need, most of us know who everyone in BHS is anyways, and it's not like you're going to start releasing products officially for a very wide range of customers.

For one I wouldn't mind knowing when you plan to add support for other C&C games and how long this thing will last out.
