So, GMail invites have been coming like crazy lately.

After a long period of Google not giving any out, I got a single one and gave it to a friend of mine. Then, we both got about 10. That was plenty to cover our group of friends (those who care about their email service, at least) with room to spare, so I've got 4 left.

If you want one, tell me where you want me to send it.

Does gmail allow you to send large files? I need an email account that will allow this, as Hotmail have harsh restrictions of 1MB.

If they do, i'd like to have one too if anyone has one spare. sanada78@hotmail.com glyde51why would any one want a e-mail account with google? www.googlewatch.org is a site telling everyone what google really wants- my cheese

I do not really care. All Google does is scan all your email with some program, then serves ads that match the keywords in your mail...at worst you may get ads that are actually interesting Anyway, no live human gets to see your mail. And even if they do, your ISP can read your mail too.

Once it's documented, nobody should send another one. I think it's safe to say that they probably received it and are mooching for more.

BTW...PM me if you want an invite. I still have 6. First come first serve. First 6 to PM me get the invites AS LONG AS you provide a correct email address.

A lot of people are saying that GMail is better then anyother email service.

I think thats completely wrong. You obviously never tried Spymac.com Email Service. It gives you 1 GB (long before GMail started), you don't need a silly invite and it just works as it should be...

I'm not saying Spymac is better then GMail. My point is that there are much more free services that could be better, you just have to give them a try.

BTW: j_ball430, the word you were looking for is 'tamagoshi'.

Gmail is a BETA service, meaning it's still in development, the invite thing is to keep the number of users under a certain limit during the testing, once they are happy with it currently, they make more room and send out more invites.

And because Spymac had 1 GB before Gmail doesn't make it better in anyway.
