Spam just pisses half the members here off, the other half of the members didn't even make a single post yet. (Really, I took the time to see, page 71 out of 132 is where the post count starts to read 0 on the memberlist.)

PSP is too restricting. It doesn't have near the same capacities as Photoshop does.

PSP is too restricting. It doesn't have near the same capacities as Photoshop does.

It's mostly down to personal preference.

For a start most professional graphic designers will tell you that Paint Shop Pro and Photoshop both have their good points. Also the capacities are only limited by the plug-ins. I have 20+ for PSP and 10+ for Photoshop.

For that image I posted earlier, I used Paint for accurate pixel editing, which does its job for a free application. Every image I do, I use many different tools for it. Paint Shop Pro and Photoshop work very well together, just for that image I decided it wasn't best/quickest to use Photoshop.

psp is more logical, i like it.

Some things, like paths and anti-aliasing are just better in Adobe Photoshop, use it mostly for final effects/color editing.
