I saw some people doing this today on islands. 4 people got hotwires, and went into the tib field. Then, they just started repairing each other and didnt stop and they ended up racking up around 1000 points in 10 minutes. They all got kicked though. Ha.

yeah, you can do that with a gunner, keep shooting the floor to damage yourself while a hotwire heals you for points. it's gay and will get you kicked by anyone with a brain. it's nearly as pathetic as shooting tanks with a ramjet

And as gay as throwing c4 on each other then repairing. These are noob tactics. If you can't get the points by hitting the enemy, why are you playing?

Point whoring by shooting Ramjets at tanks are a bit lame, but in the servers I play it is accepted as a valid tactic. Skilled players (including me, a not-so-skilled player) use this to try and turn the tide of the game when we're a few hundred points behind.

It should be left as one of the last options though, you've got so many more things to do than holding the trigger and aiming at tanks. Try shooting down aircrafts for instance. More fun guaranteed.

Why the hell would you bother doing that when you can get twice the points in half that time by playing repairman for combat-damaged units and buildings? I play engineer/hotwire/technician a lot (when I play, that is), and whenever I do I usually get at least the #2 or #3 spot on the team just from running around making repairs. There's always someone limping back to base with a near-dead tank, or some twerp pontwhoring off your buildings, or something else that needs doing. Much more rewarding than standing there pointlessly in a tiberium field blue-beaming another useless fucktard.
