Thats tragic, but it's good that the Tsunami warning system was tested.

Javaxcx pointed this out in IRC, but doesn't it seems coincidental that both tsunamis happened after two major Christian holidays?

Lucky this one caused very little damage...

Besides they expected another one after the last one weekend the area, from what I heard.

They're not Christian holidays. They have been conformed into "christian" holidays by predominant religious influences such as the entire Catholic denomination.

Christmas has absolutely no Christian significance other than the reminder that Christ was born on some day of the year that we don't know. So we ended up slapping a day on the pagan holiday regarding a birth of one of the pagan gods, and slapped Easter on the spring Equinox and called it the resurrection of Christ.

What is coincidental, is that two earthquakes occurred over a mostly pagan/non-Christian region exactly one day after a major PAGAN holiday.

My church group is now in the possession of a device with which we will purge the lands of immoral scum. Bwahaha. You are the next target for trying to warn the land.

It is coincidental that they happened after major holidays. But the question is: Does it matter?

I think there are too many damn holidays around the world for this truly to be a "coincidence".

There was no tsunami after the second earthquake. There wasn't enough displacement on the ocean floor to create one, and even if it did this one would have gone towards Antarctica instead.
