To quote Maddox's FAQ:

Quote:

Why do you use such huge fonts?

Protest. I'm keeping my web site shitty as a protest against all the slick-looking, contentless web sites out there. Nobody cares about your stupid rotating icons and fading links. Mine isn't the only site on the internet that uses a simple layout, perhaps you've heard of this one?

Some webmasters have spent years tweaking their layout and designing their site, and very few get any traffic. This site, as shitty as it looks, gets over 1 million visits per month. I use large fonts also as a protest against all the stylish garbage you see out there. When I go to a web site, I WANT TO READ THE CONTENT. Trust me, that micro-font everyone uses isn't nearly as original as they think. I've chosen a black background for most of my text because it's easier on the eyes than staring at a white screen. Think about it: your monitor is not a piece of paper, no matter how hard you try to make it one. Staring at a white background while you read is like staring at a light bulb (don't believe me? Try turning off the lights next time you use a word processor). Would you stare at a light bulb for hours at a time? Not if you want to keep your vision.

Did I ever go to the point of correcting sentence structure to the point of where you're taking it? No? Oh that's right, because I don't care to. So let me clue you in, I will take certain liberties on the Internet and that's one of them. I will not use that as an excuse to do this:

...Like so many of you do.

Now excuse me, I have more bad sentence structure to continue using... And misspelling that idiot Freud's name is something I'm not too worried about, because I do happen to make typing errors every so often just as anyone else does.

Mainly, I have to scooch up from my chair to not lose track of where I am when I finish a line. This is because the text is small and the lines are so close together. Normally it's not a problem, but I was really tired when I was looking at it. Still though, that's stupid on the website's part.

I don't know why I bother... no doubt someone who knows nothing about me will try and be funny by saying I need to learn how to read. I can read, trust me...the problem is with the lame micro-text.

I think there's a difference between actually having 20/15, and having better-than-20/20 vision but having a harder time seeing up close.

The only reason I don't really believe you can see close up as well is because you're complaining about micro-text. I can see micro-text just fine without losing my place or anything. It's just something you're not used to, which makes it annoying.

20/20 is normal. 20/15 means that when you're standing 20 feet away from the eye chart, you'd see the same amount of detail that a normal person would see if he were standing 15 feet away from the eye chart. Meaning you have better vision.

If it was something like 20/50, it would mean that when you're standing 20 feet away from the chart, you'd see the same amount of detail as someone standing 50 feet away, which would mean you'd have worse vision.

cowmisfitAircraftkillerI do happen to make typing errors every so often just as anyone else does.

I don't.

Even for sarcasm, even for you, that was a load of shit.

Try reading this post:

icedog90I think there's a difference between actually having 20/15, and having better-than-20/20 vision but having a harder time seeing up close.

The only reason I don't really believe you can see close up as well is because you're complaining about micro-text. I can see micro-text just fine without losing my place or anything. It's just something you're not used to, which makes it annoying.

Which was after I did my own research long before you.

And SEAL, the way you're putting this argument is just retarded, and I'm pretty sure you don't even know what the hell I'm talking about.
